Note: HSS 331.01. Youth corrections in Wisconsin is governed by ch. 48, Stats. Chapter 48 creates a responsibility for care, treatment, and education that meets the individual needs of each youth while protecting the public interest. The emphasis on individualized treatment for youth corrections under ch. 48, Stats., creates special responsibilities for the division. The entire youth correctional process must be structured to provide sufficient flexibility to allow staff to treat each youth on an individual basis, applying appropriate rewards and sanctions on the basis of individual achievement. It is important to eliminate arbitrariness and yet permit staff to make frequent individualized decisions.

This section sets out 7 goals that should characterize planning for youth in Wisconsin youth corrections. These goals should be reflected in all the youth rules.

Developing an individualized treatment plan for each youth requires identification of the needs of that youth. Subsection (1) states this as a goal. All planning must take into account the degree of control required for protection of the public. Subsection (1) recognizes this public protection duty and further states that the exercise of this duty should be accomplished in the least restrictive setting available given the behavior and needs of particular youth.

Subsection (3) identifies factors that are relevant to providing an environment in which youth may develop normally. This subsection fulfills the legislative purpose under s. 48.01 (1) (b) and (c), Stats. The factors identified are similar to the opportunities available to youth in their own homes. They are ingredients for an environment that meets basic human needs necessary for normal growth and development. The goal of this subsection is recognized in IJA-ABA Standards, standard 4.9, infra. It is necessary to begin treatment of youth as soon as possible to achieve successful reintegration into the community. Subsection (6) recognizes that individualized treatment is successful only if planning begins early in the process and continuity of treatment is maintained.

Obviously, fairness is a goal in the treatment of youth. The goal stated under sub. (7) recognizes that fair treatment requires that a balance be struck allowing sufficient flexibility for individualized treatment decisions, while protecting the youth against arbitrary alteration in the youth's status, placement, or personal freedom. The formal hearings required for major decisions referred to in sub. (7) are intended to fulfill the essential elements of due process. These elements are that the youth be given notice of the kind of decision about to be made, have an opportunity to be heard, and be given reasons for the decision that is ultimately made. Fairness can be achieved without unnecessary formality. Subsection (7) substantially fulfills the due process recommendations for youth corrections contained in Institute of Judicial Administration - American Bar Association, Juvenile Justice Standards Project, Standards Relating to Corrections Administration, (1980) (hereinafter "IJA-ABA Standards") standard 4.6; and s. 48.01 (1) (a), Stats.

Note: HSS 331.04. Every youth whose legal custody is transferred to the department is admitted to the receiving center designated by the court for orientation, evaluation, plan development and assignment to an institution or expeditious placement in alternate care. These purposes of reception substantially conform to American Correctional Association Manual of Standards for Juvenile Detention Schools and Services, (1979) (hereinafter "ACA Juvenile Standards"), standards 9447, 9448, 9449 and 9452.

Note: HSS 331.05. No time may be more important to the young person in determining later attitudes and patterns of behavior than that person's first weeks in the institution.

A youth is encouraged to participate in planning for the short and long term decisions affecting him or her. Meaningful participation by youth in setting their goals and objectives and taking advantage of opportunities in the system obviously requires an understanding of what is available.

Oral orientation is essential for youth because many youth have reading disabilities that could prevent them from obtaining information necessary to successfully participate in planning for their future or learn what is expected of them. Subsection (2) lists several areas of oral orientation that are required and sub. (3) provides that information communicated must be written. As a practical matter, the oral orientation may be the only effective means of fulfilling the purposes under sub. (1). It is important for staff to recognize this and encourage youth to ask questions of any staff member throughout the time they are in custody.

Subsection (3) (c) requires that the rules of conduct the youth is required to observe and the mechanisms available to the youth for input and feedback to staff and administration be recorded and available to the youth for listening. These recordings are akin to an oral presentation, but do not replace oral communication. Rather, they additionally aid youth who may have trouble reading, or for whom English is not the native language. The information should be transmitted to the youth in a manner that fosters understanding in the youth's native language, if necessary.

Orientation is a time for youth to learn what staff expect of them and what youth can expect. It is an opportunity for informal questions and answer periods to clarify policy, elaborate on points, and stress particularly important areas.

Subsection (3) (a) requires that each youth receive a written copy of the conduct rules. This policy was adopted because these rules are of such immediate importance to youth that they need a ready reference source. Other policies must be available in writing under sub. (3) (b), so a youth can use them to better understand areas of interest.

The written policy governing orientation under this section substantially conforms to standard 8343, ACA Juvenile Standards. Youth are not required to sign a statement documenting completion of orientation, considered essential under ACA Juvenile Standards, Standard 9450, because the division considers this requirement unnecessarily coercive and, therefore, undesirable.

Note: HSS 331.06. Youth are transferred from one correctional institution to another or placed in alternate care at the end of reception and at other times. Orientation which is specific to the alternate care placement site or institution is required under this section. Although the youth will receive a general orientation under s. HSS 331.05, he or she will need to be informed more specifically of the particular requirements of the new institution or alternate care placement site. Correctional staff should be responsible to see that an orientation for placements in alternate care is conducted.

Note: HSS 331.07. This section requires an evaluation of all youth whose legal custody is transferred to the division in order to determine the correct placement for each youth. It interprets s. 48.60, Stats. In making the evaluation required under this section the department, under s. 48.60 (1) Stats., may use any facilities, public or private, which offer aid to it in the determination of the correct placement for the child.

The information compiled during examinations under sub. (2) must be written in a report. This report and the field history report required under sub. (3) are used to provide background factual information for the planning decision under s. HSS 331.08 (3) (e).

This section substantially conforms to ACA Juvenile Standards, standard 9449.

Note: HSS 331.08. The reception planning and review conference is a significant decision making point for the youth. The long-term, transitional and immediate placement decisions are made at this conference. The procedure for the conference is contained in this section. The criteria for the decision are contained in s. HSS 331.09.

HSS 331.08 reflects a conscious effort to design a fair decision making process that provides the youth with notice of what is to be considered, an opportunity to be heard on the issues being decided, the decision, and the reasons for it. The process contains the essential elements of due process. It is designed to involve the youth in planning for his or her future in a constructive manner, free from reliance on adversary proceedings. Experience in youth corrections teaches that unduly adversary procedures involving right to call witnesses, cross examination, and legal assistance seriously detracts from the correctional process immediately confronting the youth and frustrates goals of institutional adjustment and successful reintegration into the community. The process is also designed to include all who can and should contribute to informed planning.

It is desirable to have the youth involved in planning, for he or she may have essential information, present accurate facts not reflected in the reception center admissions report, and may develop amenability to treatment due to involvement in planning.

The process provides the basic concepts of due process and formality recommended by IJA-ABA Standards, standard 4.5 and ACA Juvenile Standards, standards 9458 and 9459.

Register, April, 1995, No. 472

Note: HSS 331.09 sets forth the only criteria which may be used to make the decisions under s. HSS 331.08 (3) (e) about the components of the long-term, transitional, and immediate placement for the term of the youth's commitment.

Under sub. (1), underlying facts may be more important for correctional decisions than the label put on the offense. For example, whether an offense posed physical danger to another can be considered and may be important.

Prior placement history is significant because the statutory policy of choosing the least restrictive alternative consistent with protection of the public requires an evaluation of whether those placements are appropriate to the youth's needs. Subsection (2) makes this history relevant for planning.

Subsection (3) makes physical aggressiveness a criterion. Experience indicates that there are very few placement settings that can handle the aggressive youth. Consequently, when hyper-aggressiveness is identified as a significant behavior problem, assignment to an institution may be most appropriate. This factor like others, however, must be carefully assessed to assure that there is a truly demonstrable behavior pattern of physical aggressiveness. If circumstances indicate an isolated instance, efforts to determine if there was a high degree of provocation involved should be made. The latter analysis may provide a clue as to the probability of future acts occurring at some other placements.

A runaway pattern under sub. (4), like aggressiveness, is very difficult for many placement settings to handle. It is, therefore, a significant criterion, especially when viewed in relation to the threat the youth poses to protection of the public.

Subsection (5) makes rehabilitation needs a relevant factor in planning because the primary goal of youth corrections is to change attitudes, values, and behavior so a youth's chance of becoming further involved in delinquent activity is reduced and he or she has a better chance of reintegration into the community.

The youth's attitude toward the offense, motivation for the offense, and attitude towards the rehabilitation process are relevant. If a youth shows no remorse and believes that the rehabilitation process has no value, that person may require closer supervision. Subsection (6) permits these factors to be considered.

The youth's perception of needs sometimes determines his or her attitude toward the offense and the rehabilitation process. Subsection (7) recognizes this concern. A youth who readily accepts responsibility for his or her behavior and acknowledges the benefits of appropriate programming may be a youth ready for progressive programming.

The youth's conduct and adjustment in the reception center is a criterion under sub. (9). The reception center offers the first opportunity to observe a youth's adjustment to correctional institutionalization. Positive adjustment may indicate a willingness to accept the correctional rehabilitation process. Youth who develop leadership roles may be encouraged to develop these skills to enhance their own self concept and to further overall institution treatment goals. Negative adjustment may indicate that a highly structured and supervised program of high security is best for the youth, though this is not always true.

Given the importance of the family unit to normal growth and development, a primary goal of planning efforts is to assure preservation and strengthening of the family unit. The assessment of the family prepared under s. HSS 331.07 (2) and (3) for the JPRC is critical in the development of a plan relative to the potential for and possible time of return to the family home. Subsection (10) makes this a significant factor in the planning decision. This is consistent with the legislative purpose of s. 48.01 (1) (b), Stats. The importance of parental attitude for reintegration into the family cannot be overemphasized. Where there is parental rejection, a plan is to be developed to help the youth deal with this fact, so the youth can be helped to an alternate placement. If a family is seen to possess the desire and necessary strengths for reintegration, a plan is to be developed which provides the youth and parents with knowledge and skill necessary to give the youth direction, control, and support to avoid future involvement in delinquent activity.

Subsection (11) permits perceived community attitudes to be considered in deciding what plan is in the best interests of the youth. Since return to the home is a goal, the community in which the home is situated can have a positive or negative effect on reintegration. Where the effects of negative attitudes would directly affect the youth's adjustment, consideration would need to be given to planning other placement options. For example, if the youth wants and needs to complete his or her education, and the attitudes of school personnel are very negative and can't be changed, the youth's chances of successful reintegration into school would be severely handicapped. In such circumstances the most appropriate planning decision may be to consider alternate placements to integrate the youth in a positive atmosphere.

The specification of criteria conforms to ACA Juvenile Standards, standard 9458.

Note: HSS 331.10. When the decision by the JORP is to release a youth to alternate care, the responsible party must find a specific placement that fulfills the general specifications of the decision. However, actual placement in a group or foster home or child caring institution cannot be accomplished without acceptance of the youth by the home or institution. If, for example, a particular group home of the type specified in the planning decision will not accept a youth, the responsible party must attempt to find another group home that offers the specifications contained in the plan. Other examples which may prevent implementation are as follows:

- 1) the unique nature of the child's needs, with background;
- 2) identifiable gaps in the service system;
- 3) lack of alternatives or alternatives filled to capacity;
- 4) need for additional time;
- 5) need for additional intensive work with the family before or concurrent with the youth's return, which is unavailable;
- 6) other identifiable reasons; or
- 7) unidentifiable reasons with justification for this designation.

If the responsible party is unsuccessful in finding any placement within 30 days of the recommended decision under s. HSS 331.08 (3) (e), the responsible party must document the reasons and notify the appropriate parties under sub. (2) (a).

Note: HSS 331.11. Whereas a plan may call for the youth to go to school part-time and work part-time, the program assignment will be to a specific job and course of study. Every youth is eligible under this section for any school, vocational job or other program within the youth correctional system, provided he or she is appropriately placed. The goal of having sufficient resources so every youth has an opportunity to participate in programs that meet individual needs is implicit. However, population pressures and particular security needs may make this difficult.

Note: HSS 331.12. Following a decision under ss. HSS 331.13 and 331.14, every youth must be evaluated by the institution. This may be done at a treatment review in the living unit to which the youth is assigned to determine the appropriate specific program needs of the youth. The day to day program decisions are made at the treatment review. The specific elements of the cottage program appropriate for each youth differ and the progress of each youth within the cottage program is based upon individual achievement. Consequently, those persons who work with the youth on a day to day basis must make immediate decisions about the youth's program.

Experience with youth teaches that adjustments in the specific program privileges based upon the youth's accomplishment of specified goals must be made in a short period of time following the demonstrated improvement. Youngsters perceive time spans much differently than adults. If progress and good behavior are to be rewarded by increased privileges in a cottage, for example, that decision must be made quickly for it to be relevant to the youth and for it to be a positive correctional decision. The same principle holds true for determination and consequent privilege withdrawal. This difference between youth and adults necessitates the involvement of a treatment team or other institution program authority in specific programming on a weekly basis and sometimes more frequently.

The purposes of the treatment review are set forth in subsection (2). These are similar to the purposes of the JPRC programming except for the more specific nature of the treatment review decisions. The treatment review makes specific decisions within the program recommended by the JPRC and decided upon by the institution programming authority. Staff making the treatment review and implementing the overall treatment plan should work closely with the JPRC and may recommend that the JPRC meet to review major changes in the youth.

Subsection (3) requires the people making the treatment review to include regular members of the education, residential care, and social work staff. Regular involvement by one individual from each of these areas is required so that the members are familiar with the progress of each youth. In this way they will know each youth as an individual and be better able to make decisions affecting that person.

Subsection (5) states that youth may talk to members and encourages them to do so. Since a youth has no right to appear at the meeting, personal conversation with members insures that the youth's opinions may be expressed.

Treatment review substantially complies with ACA Juvenile Standards, standard 9457.

Note: HSS 331.13. Subsection (1) requires the JPRC to review and evaluate every youth who is placed in an institution. This review is necessary to properly implement the decision by deciding which institution programs, security needs and treatment needs are consistent with the conference committee's decision. Subsequent progress reviews are required under sub. (1) to enable the JPRC to periodically evaluate the extent to which the decisions made about the youth are consistent with the long term plan for the youth.

When a major change in a youth's institution program is implemented, the JPRC is to be notified through progress summaries. Day to day decisions about cottage life and privileges the youth is entitled to are made under the superintendent's authority under s. HSS 331.12 by the treatment team or some other institution programming authority.

Because it is essential that program review be meaningful and that there be informed decision makers, it is required under sub. (4) that the programming authority obtain relevant information from the designated staff.

Note: HSS 331.14. JPRC and other reviews have a substantial impact on the life of a youth and may be significant in a release decision. Therefore, the role of the institution representative in explaining the process to the youth is crucial to the youth's developing an understanding of the process and the kind of recommendation being made.

The entire procedure under this section is designed to promote fairness in making these important decisions about youth. This effort is reflected in subs. (1) to (6) by the requirements of subs. (1) and (3) (a) about notice and explanation of the review; the fact in sub. (3) (b) that the youth may be present and dispute facts, state an opinion and present additional facts; and the requirement in sub. (7) that decisions with specific facts and criteria relied upon must be written and given to the youth.

Note: HSS 331.16. The agent's plan should contain the agent's opinion as to whether release is appropriate. The report should include the elements required for the JPRC recommendation under sub. (2). For specific discussion of the agent's role, see ch. HSS 345.
