2           to law enforcement agencies for body cameras.

Analysis by the Legislative Reference Bureau

Current law does not require law enforcement agencies to use body cameras on law enforcement officers, but current law regulates what a law enforcement agency must do if it uses a body camera on a law enforcement officer. Under current law, if a law enforcement agency uses a body camera on an officer, the agency must have a written policy regarding the use and storage of the cameras and any limitations on which officers will wear them and on situations and encounters that may be recorded and the agency is subject to the records retention provisions regarding data from the camera.

This bill requires the Department of Justice to award grants to law enforcement agencies to purchase body cameras to use on law enforcement officers whose primary duties are patrolling duties. A law enforcement agency that receives a grant must, for at least three years after receiving the grant funds, use body cameras on all such law enforcement officers and require the officers to activate the camera in situations in which the officer has contact with a member of the public while enforcing laws or investigating conduct. Such situations include traffic stops, arrests, searches, interrogations, or interviews.

Under the bill, law enforcement agencies may apply for the grants. The application must contain a proposed plan to spend the grant money, including the estimated cost per body camera and the number of body cameras needed; a statement indicating that the law enforcement agency will match the amount of the grant it receives; and the amount of time the law enforcement agency anticipates it will need after receiving the grant money to comply with the requirement that all of its patrol officers use a body camera. The agency also must agree to maintain the equipment for at least three years after the grant is awarded. If available grant funds are not sufficient to award grants to all eligible applicants, DOJ may consider fairness among different population areas and need based on crime rates when awarding the grants.

The bill also requires DOJ to consult with vendors of body cameras, within 90 days after the bill is enacted, to find cost-saving measures that a law enforcement agency may use when applying for a grant. The bill also requires DOJ and the Department of Administration to develop options for reducing the cost of storing data from body cameras used by law enforcement agencies.

For further information see the state and local fiscal estimate, which will be printed as an appendix to this bill.
