International Joint Commission

March 31, 1994

A Report to the Governments of Canada and the United States

In its report to the Governments of Canada and the United States, the International Joint Commission recommends a range of actions to alleviate the adverse consequences of fluctuating water levels in the Great Lakes - St. Lawrence River basin.

Governments should promote shoreline management measures as the principal component of a strategy to reduce flooding and erosion losses. The measures, which should be adapted to local conditions, include requiring that new construction be landward of defined erosion zones and elevated above flood levels, providing incentives for relocation of certain dwellings and others.

The Commission did not recommend building additional dams and control works to regulate levels and flows to a greater extent than can be accomplished with existing structures at the outlets of Lakes Superior and Ontario. Studies performed for the Commission did not show that such projects were justified in light of the economic costs and negative impacts on the shoreline and environment in portions of the Great Lakes - St. Lawrence River system.

The Commission also recommended that data gathering and analysis be improved for flood and erosion damages, wetland areas and conditions affecting water supplies. In addition, a binational information center should be established to increase information sharing with the public and governments at all levels should prepare more effectively for crisis conditions.

In 1986, when all Great Lakes except Lake Ontario were at record high levels, the two federal governments asked the Commission to examine and report on methods of alleviating the adverse consequences of fluctuating water levels. The Commission's final report is based on studies by its Levels Reference Study Board, Citizens Advisory Committee, Project Management Team and Great Lakes Water Levels Task Force, as well as extensive public consultation. Interim recommendations were provided to the governments at various times during the studies.

The International Joint Commission was created under the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 to help prevent disputes regarding use of boundary waters and to advise Canada and the United States on questions of mutual concern along the boundary.
