5 health care records.

Analysis by the Legislative Reference Bureau

Under current law, certain records related to the health of a patient that are prepared by or under the supervision of a health care provider (patient health care records) are confidential and may be released only with the written consent of the patient or of a person authorized by the patient. This consent (informed consent) must detail the patient's name; the type of information to be disclosed; the types of health care providers making the disclosure; the purpose of the disclosure; the individual or entity to which disclosure may be made; the patient's signature or that of the person authorized by the patient; the date of signature; and the time period during which the consent is effective. Current law has numerous exceptions to the confidentiality requirements that permit access to patient health care records without the informed consent of the patient or of a person authorized by the patient. A health care provider must record the name of the person or agency that receives access, the date and time of the release, and the identification of the patient health care records released. However, redisclosure of information obtained under one of the exceptions is prohibited, unless authorized by a court or under an insurance transaction that authorizes the disclosure of personal medical information about an individual to an insurer.

This bill eliminates current restrictions on redisclosure of a patient health care record that is obtained under one of the exceptions to the requirements of confidentiality. The bill, instead, authorizes the redisclosure of a patient health care record, if made by a covered entity (as defined in the bill) for a purpose for which a release is otherwise permitted. The bill authorizes an entity that is not a covered entity to redisclose a patient health care record only if the patient or a person authorized by the patient provides informed consent, a court of record orders the redisclosure, or the redisclosure is limited to the purpose for which the patient health care record was initially received.

The bill permits a health care provider to release, without informed consent, a portion, but not a copy, of a patient health care record, as follows:

1. If the patient or a person authorized by the patient is not incapacitated, is physically available, and agrees to the release of that portion, to anyone.

2. If the patient and the person authorized by the patient are incapacitated or not physically available or if an emergency makes it impracticable to obtain agreement from the patient or person, and if the health care provider determines that release is in the best interest of the patient, to (1) a member of the patient's immediate family, another relative, a close personal friend, or an individual identified by the patient, that portion of the patient health care record that is directly relevant to involvement by the person in the patient's care; or (2) any person, that portion of the patient health care record that is necessary to identify, locate, or notify a member of the patient's immediate family or another person concerning the patient's location, general condition, or death.

Under current law, records that are created in the course of providing services to individuals for mental illness, developmental disabilities, alcoholism, or drug dependence (treatment records) are confidential and may be released only with the informed consent of the individual. The requirements for the informed consent are similar to the informed consent requirements for patient health care records. However, the confidentiality requirements for treatment records have numerous exceptions that permit access without informed consent. One of these exceptions is for release of treatment records to a health care provider in a related health care entity, or any person acting under the supervision of the health care provider who is involved with the individual's care, if necessary for the individual's current treatment. Information that may be released under this exception is limited to the individual's name, address and date of birth; the individual's treatment provider; the date of service provided; the individual's medications, allergies, and diagnosis; and other relevant demographic information necessary for the individual's current treatment.

This bill changes the exception to the confidentiality requirements for treatment records to allow access by any health care provider or person acting under the supervision of the health care provider who is involved with an individual's care, if necessary for the individual's current treatment. The bill expands information that may be released under the exception to include diagnostic test results, as defined in the bill, and symptoms.
